Is My Car Considered a Junk Vehicle?

As the number of miles a car has been driven increases, the resale value of the car decreases. But, at what point does the car become classified as a junk car? How should you handle selling the vehicle if it's considered junk?

If a car is still operable, or if it does not run but is reasonably repairable, in addition to the total miles on a car, other factors help determine how much it's worth. For example, a buyer will also consider:

- How many miles are there on the car?
- Does it have body damage?
- Are the exterior and interior clean and in good repair?
- What is the make and model of the car?
- How much would it cost to repair the car?
- Was the car driven mostly in the city or on the highway?
- Possibly other considerations

All these factors are used in valuations for cars to be sold for driving. But junk car values are typically based on current scrap metal rates.

So, What's the Best Way to Sell My Broken Down Car?

If you decide to repair the car to make it operable and then sell it, there are various approaches to selling it that you can choose. You could try to trade it in, sell it to a dealer, or sell it directly to a private buyer who has found you through word of mouth or your classified ad in the local newspaper, your local online marketplace, etc.

But, if your car is not running and the cost of repairing it is just not worth doing, then the decision becomes even simpler. Selling the car for salvage to Junk Car Cashout offers great advantages, including simplicity, a speedy sales transaction, and free towing to remove the broken car from your property.
